Innovative is Invigorating for Business as well as Education By Deborah Browne This book was an eye-opener for myself as well as my Team, a alternative HS in Brooklyn. It is written in an extremely accessible way and is a game changer in terms of thinking about designing your team in work and all areas of life. I loved it so much that I showed it to my Principal, who was always looking for new angles on innovative approaches to education. She invited Mr. Grivas to speak to all of our team and he delivered a riveting presentation which allowed us to identify our roles on the team and re-think how we can react to each other in a proactive way. She also bought copies for the whole staff who read it voraciously over the vacation and came back renewed and enjoyed applying business principles to our work. We were also able to apply these lessons to our students and help these understandings to our pedagogy. I highly recommend the book and the author for speaking purposes.

The tools and processes towards the back make it a handy reference for anyone engaged in teamwork focused on innovation. I've made a career with creative teams large and small, and was delighted to find useful insights and reminders that will improve performance for me and my teams. There's a Myers-Briggs like approach towards individual preferences for various aspects of the creative process that provided an AHA moment for me. If you're looking for ideas and a framework for moving your business or team forward in innovative ways, this is the book for you.

Though it is fiction it is an excellent example/story about how a group of individuals can be turned into an INNOVATIVE TEAM through strong facilitation while learning how to use an integrated mix of creative thinking tools and processes. Having been involved with the teaching/training/facilitating of team thinking and problem solving I found the characters a very good cross sampling of people in most to all workplaces. I highly recommend this for managers and trainers who need to work with diverse groups of people and strive to have them truly work as teams.
